He has traveled extensively through all All Americans who have recently been in Russia, as commercial representatives, soldiers or members of relief organizations, agree that Russia in her soil, her natural resources and her manpower, is the richest country in the world, and the one which offers the greatest possibility for foreign trade. England, France, Germany and Japan are well aware of these possibilities and are taking good care that, whatever befalls, they shall not lose their share. America, alone, seems in danger of letting the favorable moment slip by. Before the war America supplied only an insignificant part of the 700, 000, 000 worth of Russian imports. In 1913 exports direct from the United States to Russia totalled only 25, 000, 000, and in 1914 only 30, 000, 000. These figures, however, do not represent the total of American products which found their way into Russia. For instance, in the case of cotton, American figures for 1910 show the exportation of 84, 941 bales to Russia, whereas Russian statistics for the same year show an importation of 568, 500 bales of American cotton. The difference of 483, 559 bales must have come through English and German intermediaries. Thus the English and German middleman managed to secure for themselves a good share of the profits of our scanty Russian trade. The supremacy of England and Germany in the Russian market up to 1914 is conspicuously shown even in such products as...
